

Yesterday, October 1, marked the first time I have composed a talk by speaking instead of by writing. To do so I used a new program called Dragon dictate for the Mac, surprising me by spelling virtually all my words correctly.

How practical this new program will prove to be I do not now know. As I continue to experiment, I hope to find a variety of uses. Currently, its flexibility amazes me while it adds to the wide range of abilities that my computer offers.

This blog has been dictated by me rather than written. If it is less well written than my usual material, please understand I am trying something new.
