

Thinking about your own death does not make you morbid. It may even be one of the best ways of appreciating one's life, of getting more value out of every day.

The novelist Chaim Potok recounts a father answering his six-year-old son Asher's question about why every living thing must die: "Why? So life would be precious, Asher. Something that is yours forever is never precious."